

Library podcast

Thrilling Tales, A Storytime for Grownups presents: “Confession” by Algernon Blackwood

[00:00:05] Welcome to The Seattle Public Library’s podcasts of author readings and library events. Library podcasts are brought to you by The Seattle Public Library and Foundation. To learn more about our programs and podcasts, visit our web site at www dot SPL dot org. To learn how you can help the library foundation support The Seattle Public Library go to foundation dot SPL dot org

[00:00:40] Good afternoon, everybody. Welcome to Thrilling Tales. Our story, time for Grownups. My name is David. I’m a librarian here. I work on the third floor in the Readers Services Department. So if you’re looking for something good to read, come and see us sometime. This would be the best time to turn off your cell phones, iPads, anything that makes a sound or light. If you need to get out early, we can get out there where that door or here as well. I’ve got one story for you today and a couple of words before we begin. Today’s story is a story called “Confession” by Algernon Blackwood, written a little under a century ago. There’s one acronym in the story that has not lasted. And so I’ll unpack that for you so I don’t have to spell it out every time. It’s V A D, which meant Voluntary Aid Detachment, which was something sort of between an unlicensed nurse’s aide and the USO. Those of you who watched Downton Abbey may be familiar with that role. Basically, people who were looking to help the war effort but were not actually in the medical profession. That’s it. So without any further ado, “Confession” by Algernon Blackwood.

[00:02:09] The fog swirled slowly around him, driven by a heavy movement of its own. For, of course, there was no wind. It hung in poisonous thick coils and loops. It rose and sank. No light penetrated it directly from street lamp or motor car, though here and there, some big shop window sent a glimmering patch upon its ever shifting curtain. O’Reillys eyes ached and smarted with the incessant effort to see a foot beyond his face. The optic nerve grew tired and site accordingly less accurate. He coughed as he shuffled forward cautiously through the choking gloom. Only the stifled rumble of crawling traffic persuaded him he was in a crowded city at all. This and the vague outlines of groping figures hugely magnified, emerging suddenly and disappearing again as they fumbled along inch by inch towards uncertain destinations. The figures, however, were human beings. They were real. That much he knew. He heard their muffled voices, now close, now distant, strangely smothered, always. He also heard the tapping of innumerable sticks feeling for iron railings or the curb. These phantom outlines represented living people. He was not alone. It was the dread of finding himself quite alone that haunted him, but he was still unable to cross an open space without assistance. Midway, the panic terror might descend upon him. He would shake all over his will dissolve and he would shriek for help, run wildly or as they called it in his North Ontario home, throw a fit. He was not yet entirely cured, although under ordinary conditions he was safe enough, as Dr. Henry had assured him. When he left Regent's Park by Tube an hour ago, the air was clear, the November sun shone brightly. The pale blue sky was cloudless and the assumption that he could manage the journey across London town alone was justified.

[00:04:16] Dr. Henry furnished my Newt instructions You change at Piccadilly Circus without leaving the underground station mind and you get out at South Kensington. You know the address of your VRD friend. Have your cup of tea with her and then come back the same way to Regent's Park. Come back before dark, say six o'clock at latest. It's better. He had described exactly what turns to take after leaving the station. It was a little confusing, but the distance was short. You can always ask. You can't possibly go wrong. The unexpected fog, however, now blurred these instructions in a confused jumble in his mind. The failure of outer site reacted upon memory the V A D. Besides, it warned him that her address was not easy to find the first time the house lies in a backwater. But with your backwards instincts, you'll probably manage it better than any Londoner. She, too, had not calculated upon the fog.

[00:05:18] When O'Reilly came up the stairs at South Kensington Station, he emerged into such murky darkness that he thought he was still underground, an impenetrable world lay around him. Only a raw bite in the damp atmosphere told him he stood beneath an open sky for some little time. He stood and stared. A Canadian soldier is home among clear, brilliant spaces now face to face for the first time in his life.

[00:05:44] With that thing he had so often read about a bad London fog with keenest interest and surprise.

[00:05:51] He enjoyed the novel spectacle for perhaps 10 minutes. Then, with a sense of adventure, it it cost an effort. He left the covered building and plunged into the opaque sea beyond. Repeating to himself the directions he had received first to the right, second to the left, once more to the left and so forth. He checked each turn, assuring himself it was impossible to go wrong. He made correct if slow progress until someone blundered into him with an abrupt and startling question Is this right? You know, for South Kensington Station. It was the suddenness that startled him one moment there was no one. The next they were face to face another and the stranger vanished into the gloom with a courteous word of grateful. Thanks. But the little shock of interruption had put memory out of gear. Had he already turned twice to the right, or had he not? They realized sharply that he had forgotten his memorized instructions, he stood still, making strenuous efforts at recovery, but each effort left him more uncertain than before. Even the sense of direction so strong in him among his native forests was completely gone. There were no stars. There was no wind, no smell, no sound of running water. There was nothing anywhere to guide him. Nothing but occasional dim outlines groping, shuffling, emerging and disappearing in the editing fog.

[00:07:20] He was lost utterly. More he was alone, yet not quite alone.

[00:07:28] The thing he dreaded most, there were figures still in his immediate neighborhood. They emerged. Vanished. Reappeared, dissolved. He saw these thick innings of the fog. He heard their voices. The tapping of their cautious sticks. But they're real. He said to himself aloud, betraying the weak point in his armor. They're human beings right enough. I'm positive that. He had never argued with Dr. Henry. He wanted to get well. He had obeyed, implicitly, believing everything the doctor told him. Up to a point. But he'd always had his own idea about these figures because among them were often enough of his own powers from the Somme. Gallipoli. And he ought to know his own powers when he saw them. At the same time, he knew quite well. He had been shocked, had been dislocated. His system pushed into some lop sided condition that meant inaccurate registration. True, he grasped that perfectly.

[00:08:26] But in that shock and dislocation, had he not possibly picked up another gear, were there not gaps and broken edges? The pieces that no longer dovetailed fitted his usual interstices? In a word, yes. That was the word interstices cracks, so to speak, between his perception of the outside world and his inner interpretation of these between memory and recognition. His state. He well knew was abnormal. But were his symptoms on that account? Unreal.

[00:09:03] Could not these interstices be used by others? This question now revived in him with a new intensity. Were these figures in the fog real or unreal? The man who just asked the way to the station, was he not, after all, a shadow merely. By the use of his cane and foot and what sight was left to him, he knew that he was on an island.

[00:09:28] A lamp post stood up solid and straight beside him, shedding its faint patch of glimmering light. Yet there were railings, however, that puzzled him for a stick, hit the metal rods distinctly in a series, and there should be no railings round an island yet. He'd most certainly crossed a dreadful open space to get where he was. His confusion and bewilderment increased with dangerous rapidity. A rare taxi crawled past, occasionally a whitish patch at the window, indicating an anxious human face. These comforted him, rare though they were. But it was the figures that drew his attention most. He was quite sure that they were real. They were human beings like himself.

[00:10:09] For all that, he decided he might as well be positive on the point. He tried one.

[00:10:15] Accordingly, a big man who rose suddenly before him out of the very earth. Can you give him the trail to Mallie Place? He asked. But his question was drowned by the others simultaneous inquiry in a voice much louder than his own. I say this right for the tube station. Do you know I'm obviously lost? I want S10.

[00:10:32] And by the time O'Reilly had pointed the direction whence he himself had just come, the man was gone again. Obliterated, swallowed up, almost as if it seemed again he had never been there at all. He waited five minutes, not daring to move a step, and then he tried another figure, a woman this time, who luckily knew the immediate neighborhood intimately. She gave him elaborate instructions in the kindest possible way. Then vanished into a sea of gloom. Beyond the instantaneous way she vanished was disheartening. Yet she comforted him. Morley, placed, according to her version, was not 200 yards from where he stood. He felt his way forward, step by step, using his cane, crossing a giddy open space, kicking the curb with another boot. Alternately, how they were real, I guess. Anyway, he said aloud, they were both real enough. All right. And it may lift a bit soon. He was making a great effort to hold himself in hand. It may lift now. In a minute.

[00:11:37] He repeated, louder, in spite of the cold. His skin was sweating profusely, but of course it did not lift the figures to become fewer. He had followed the woman's directions carefully, but now found himself in some byway, evidently where pedestrians at the best of times were rare.

[00:11:59] His foot lost the curb, his cane swept the empty air, striking nothing solid, and panic rose upon him with its shuddering, icy grip. He was alone. He knew himself alone. Worse still, he was in another open space.

[00:12:17] It took him fifteen minutes to cross that open space. Most of the way upon his hands and knees, oblivious of the icy slime that stained his trousers, froze his fingers, intent only upon feeling solid support against his back and spine again. It was an endless period.

[00:12:37] The moment of collapse was close. The shriek already rising in his throat. The shaking of the whole body. Uncontrollable when his outstretched fingers struck a friendly curb. And he saw a glimmering patch of diffused radiance overhead with a great effort. He stood upright, and an instant later his stick rattled along an area railing. He leaned against it.

[00:12:59] Breathless, panting, his heart beating painfully, while the streetlamp gave him the further comfort of its feeble gleam. He looked this way, and that the pavement was deserted. But Morley Place, he knew, must be very close by.

[00:13:15] Now he thought of the friendly little VRD he had known in France. Have a warm, bright fire, a cup of tea and a cigarette. One more effort, he reflected. And all these would be his. He publicly groped his way forward again, crawling slowly by the area railings, provided he had no more open spaces to cross, provided the panic since.

[00:13:40] A faint darkening of the fog beneath the next lamp caught his eye and made him start. It was not a figure. This time it was the shadow of the pole grotesquely magnified. And how it moved, it moved towards him.

[00:13:57] A flame of fire, followed by ice, flowed through him. It was a figure close against his face. It was a woman.

[00:14:06] The doctor's advice came suddenly back to him. The council that had cured him of a hundred phantoms. Do not ignore them. Treat them as real. Speak and go with them. He will soon prove their unreality then, and they will leave you. He made a brave, tremendous effort. Lost your way. Like myself, Haggan man, he said in a voice that trembled. Do you know where we are at all? Mallie Place. I'm looking for the woman moved nearer, and for the first time he saw her face. Clearly its ghastly pallor. The bright, frightened eyes that stared with a kind of dazed bewilderment into his own beauty. Above all, arrested his speech midway. The woman was young, her tall figure wrapped in a dark fur coat. Can I help you? He asked, impulsively, forgetting his own terror for the moment. He was more than startled. Her air of distress stirred a peculiar anguish in him for a moment. She made no answer, thrusting her white face closer, as if examining him.

[00:15:19] Where am I? She asked at length, searching his eyes intently.

[00:15:24] I'm lost. I've lost myself.

[00:15:28] I can't find my way back. Her voice was low. A curious wailing in it. It touched his pity, oddly.

[00:15:37] He felt his own distress merging in one that was greater. Same here, he replied more confidently. I'm terrified of being alone, too. I've had shell shock, you know. Let's go together. We'll find a way together. Who are you? The woman murmured, still staring at him with her big, bright eyes. Their distress, however, no quit, lessened. She gazed at him as though aware suddenly of his presence. He told her briefly. And I'm going to tea with a V.A. de-friend in Mallie Place. What's your address? Do you? Do you know the name of the street? She appeared not to hear him, or not to understand. Exactly. It was as if she was not listening again. I came out so suddenly, so unexpectedly. He heard the low voice with pain in every syllable.

[00:16:31] I can't find my way home again. Just when I was expecting him to.

[00:16:37] She looked about her with a distraught expression that made her Riley long to carry her in his arms to safety then and there.

[00:16:45] He may be there now, waiting for me at this very moment, and I can't get back. And so sad was her voice, that only by an effort did O'Riley prevent himself putting out his hand to touch her more and more. He forgot himself in his desire to help her. He became Colmar. This woman was real enough. He asked again. The address, the street, and the number. The distance she thought it was. Have you any idea of the direction, ma'am? Any idea at all? We'll go together, and she suddenly cut him short.

[00:17:20] She turned her head as if to listen so that he saw her profile a moment. The outline of the slender neck, a glimpse of jewels just below the fur. OK.

[00:17:31] I hear him calling. I remember. And she was gone from his side into the swirling fog without an instance hesitation, O'Riley followed her not only because he wished to help, but because he dared not be left alone. He had to run. She went so rapidly, ever just in front, moving with confidence and certainty, turning right and left, crossing the street, but never stopping, never hesitating. Her companion, always at her heels in breathless haste, and with a growing terror that he might lose her any minute. It was a wild and panting pursuit, and he kept her in view with difficulty. A dim, fleeting outline, always a few yards ahead of him. She did not once turn her head. She uttered no sound, no cry. She hurried forward with unfaltering instinct. Nor did the chase occur to him once as singular. She was his safety. That was all he realized.

[00:18:27] One thing, however, he remembered afterwards a definite perfume she left upon the atmosphere, one, moreover, that he knew, although he could not find its name as he ran. It was associated vaguely for him with something unpleasant, something disagreeable. He connected it with misery and pain. He gave him a feeling of uneasiness. More than that, he did not notice it at the moment.

[00:18:55] Then suddenly the woman stopped, opened a gate, and passed into a small private garden. So suddenly that O'Reilly, close upon her heels, only just avoided tumbling into her. You found it? He cried. May I come up a moment with you? Perhaps you'll let me telephone to the doctor.

[00:19:12] She turned instantly. Her face close against his own was livid. Talk to her!

[00:19:21] She repeated in an awful whisper. The word meant terror to her.

[00:19:27] Riley stood amazed. For a second or two. Neither of them moved. The woman seemed petrified. Dr. Henry? No, he stammered, finding his tongue again. I'm in his care. He's in Harley Street. Her face cleared as suddenly as it had darkened my home.

[00:19:49] She murmured. My home is somewhere here. How near it? I must get back in time for him.

[00:19:57] I must. He's coming to me, and with these extraordinary words. She turned, walked up the narrow path, and stood upon the porch of a two story house. The front door he saw was ajar. It had been left open. For five seconds, perhaps for ten, he hesitated. It was the fear that the door would close and shut him out. That brought the decision to his will and muscles. He ran up the steps and followed the woman into the dark hall where she had already preceded him, and amid whose blackness she now had finally vanished. He closed the door, not knowing exactly why he did so, and knew at once by an instinctive feeling that the house he now found himself in with this unknown woman was empty and unoccupied in a house. However, he felt safe. It was the open streets that were his danger. He stood waiting, listening, and he heard the woman moving down the passage from door to door, repeating to herself in her low voice of unhappy wailing. Some words he could not understand.

[00:21:10] Where is it? Oh, where is it?

[00:21:14] I must get back. Seeking relief in action of some kind. He put out a hand, automatically feeling along the wall for an electric switch. And though he founded by some miraculous chance. No answering, Glo responded to the click and the woman's voice from the darkness. At last I found it.

[00:21:39] I'm home again, at last I heard a door open and close upstairs. He was on the ground floor now alone. Complete silence followed in the conflict of various emotions. There was yet a bigger ingredient demanding instant explanation. Was the woman real? Or was she unreal? Was she a human being or a figure? The horror of doubt obsessed him with an acute uneasiness that portrayed itself in a return of that unwelcome inner trembling he knew was dangerous. What saved him from a crisis that must have had most dangerous results for his mind and nervous system generally seems to have been the outstanding fact that he felt more for the woman than for himself. His sympathy and pity had been deeply moved. Added to this was the detail that she had left him, gone to another floor without a word, and now behind a closed door in a room upstairs, found herself face to face at last, with the unknown object of her frantic search with it, whatever it might be. Real or unreal figure or human being. The overmastering impulse of his being was that he must go to her. He struck a match. He found a stump of candle. He made his way by means of this flickering light along the passage, and up the carpet the stairs. He moved cautiously, stealthily. The house he now saw was indeed untalented.

[00:23:21] Dust sheets covered, the piled of furniture he glimpsed through doors ajar, pictures screamed upon the walls, brackets draped to look like hooded heads. He went on slowly, steadily moving on tiptoe, as though conscious of being watched. Noting the well of darkness in the hall below the grotesque shadows that his movements cast on walls and ceiling. The silence was unpleasant. Yet remembering that the woman was expecting someone, he did not wish it broken. He reached the landing and stood still. Closed doors on both sides of a corridor met his sight as he shaded the candle to examine the scene behind which of these doors, he asked himself, was the woman, figure or human being now alone with it? He tried a door on the right, an empty room with the furniture hidden by dust sheets, and the mattress rolled upon the bed. He tried the second door, leaving the first one open behind him, and it was similarly an empty bedroom coming out into the corridor again. He stood a moment waiting, and called aloud in a low voice that yet woke echoes unpleasantly in the hall below. Where are you? I want to help. Which room are you in? There was no answer. And he was almost glad he heard no sound, for he knew quite well that he was waiting really for another sound, the steps of him who was expected.

[00:24:52] And the idea of meeting with this unknown third sent a shudder through him, waiting another moment or two. He noted that his candle stump was burning, though, then crossed the landing with a feeling at once of hesitation and determination towards a door opposite him. He opened it. He did not halt on the threshold, holding the candle at arm's length. He went boldly in, and instantly his nostrils told him he was right at last for a whiff of that strange perfume. Though this time much stronger than before, greeted him, sending a new quiver along his nerves, he knew now why it was associated with unpleasantness, with pain, with misery. He recognized it. The odor of a hospital in this room, a powerful anesthetic, had been used. And recently. Simultaneously with smell, sight brought its message to the large double bed behind the door on his right lay to his amazement, the woman in the dark fur coat. He saw the jewels on the slender neck, but the eyes he did not see. They were closed, closed, too. He grasped that once in death. The body lay stretched to full length, quite motionless. He approached a dark, thin streak that came from the parted lips and passed downwards over the chin, losing itself then in the fur collar was a trickle of blood. It was hardly dry. It glistened.

[00:26:26] Strange. It was, perhaps, that while imaginary fears had the power to paralyze him mind and body.

[00:26:31] The sight of something real had the effect of restoring confidence. The sight of blood and death, amid conditions often ghastly and even monstrous, was no new thing to him. He went up quietly and with steady hand. He felt the woman's cheek, the warmth of recent life still in its softness. The final cold had not yet mastered this empty form, whose beauty, in its perfect stillness, had taken on the yet new strange sweetness of an unearthly bloom. Pallid, silent. Um, tenanted. It lay before him, lit by the flicker of his guttering candle. He lifted the fur coat to feel for the UN beating heart a couple of hours ago. At most, he judged this heart was working busily. The breath came through those parted lips. The eyes were shining and full beauty. His hand encountered a hard knob, the head of a long steel hatpin driven through the heart up to its hilt.

[00:27:38] He knew then, which was the figure, which was the real and which the unreal, he knew also what had been meant by it.

[00:27:49] But before he could think or reflect what action he must take, before he could straighten himself, even from his bent position over the body on the bed there sounded through the empty house, below the loud clang of the front door being closed. He turned, extinguishing the candle in the violent, trembling of his hand and tore headlong from the room. The following ten minutes seemed a nightmare in which he was not master of himself and knew not exactly what he did. All he realized was the steps already sounded on the stairs, coming quickly nearer the flicker of an electric torch played on the banisters, he thought. In a frenzied second, a police of his presence in the house of the murdered woman. It was a sinister combination. Whatever happened, he must escape without being so much as even seen. His heart raced madly. He darted across the landing into the room opposite whose door he had luckily left open. And by some incredible chance, apparently he was neither seen or heard by the man who a moment later reached the landing, entered the room where the body of the woman lay, and closed the door carefully behind him, shaking, scarcely daring to breathe, lest his breath be audible. O'Riley, in the grip of his own personal terror, realized one clear issue that he must get out of the house without being heard or seen who the newcomer was. He did not know beyond an uncanny assurance that it was not he in whom the woman had expected, but the murderer himself, and that it was the murderer in his turn, who was expecting this third person in that room with death at his elbow, a death he had himself brought about. But an hour or two ago, the murderer now hid in, waiting for this second victim.

[00:29:35] The door was closed. Yet at any minute it might open again. Cutting off retreat. O'Riley crept out, stole across the landing, reached the head of the stairs, and began with utmost caution, the perilous descent.

[00:29:48] Each time the bare boards creaked beneath his weight, no matter how stealthily his weight was adjusted, his heart missed a beat. He tested each step before he pressed upon it, distributing as much of his weight as he dared upon the banisters. It was a little more than halfway down that, to his horror, his foot caught in a projecting carpet tack. He slipped on the polished wood, only saved himself from falling headlong by a wild clutch at the railing, making an uproar that seemed to him like the explosion of a hand grenade in the forgotten trenches. His nerves gave way, and the panic seized him in the silence that followed the resounding echoes. He heard the bedroom door opening on the floor above concealment. Now was useless. He took the last flight of stairs and a series of leaps, four steps at a time, reached the hall, flew across it, and opened the door just as his pursuer electric torch in hand covered half the stairs behind him, slamming the door. He plunged headlong into the welcome, all obscuring fog outside. The fog had now no terrorists for whom he welcomed its concealing mantle, nor did it matter in which direction he ran, so long as he put distance between him and the House of Death. He crossed open spaces without a tremor. No people were about no boom of traffic, reached his ears when he paused for breath at length against an area railing.

[00:31:15] And then for the first time, he made the discovery that he had no heart. He remembered now in examining the body, partly out of respect, partly because unconsciously he had taken it off and laid it on the very bed.

[00:31:31] It was there a tail tail bit of damning evidence in the house of death, and a series of probable consequences flashed through his mind like lightning. It was a new hat. Fortunately more fortunate. Still, he had not yet written name or initials in it, but the maker's mark was there for all to read, and the police would go immediately to the shop where he had bought it. Only two days before what the shop people remember his appearance would his visit. The date? The conversation be recalled. He thought it was unlikely he resembled dozens of men. He had no outstanding peculiarity.

[00:32:07] He tried to think, but his mind was confused and troubled. His heart was beating dreadfully. He felt desperately ill. He clung to the icy railings, hardly able to keep upright collapse very near.

[00:32:20] When suddenly a figure emerged from the fog, paused a moment to stare at him, put out a hand, and caught him, and then spoke. Here you. My dear sir. To demands kindly voice. Can I be of any assistance? Come on, let me help you. He had seen at once that it was not a case of drunkenness. Come take my arm, won't you?

[00:32:45] I'm a physician. Luckily to your just outside my very house. Come in. And he half dragged, half pushed. O'Reilly now bordering on collapse, up the steps and open the door with his latchkey. I felt ill, suddenly lost in the fog. Terrified, but I'll be all right soon. Thanks awfully. The Canadian stammered, his gratitude already feeling better. He sank into a chair in the hall while the other put down a paper parcel. He had been carrying and led him presently into a comfortable room. A fire burned brightly. The electric lamps were pleasantly shaded. Her decanter of whisky and a syphon stood on a small table beside a big armchair, and before a rally could find another word to see, the other had poured him out of glass, and bade him sip it slowly without troubling to talk till he felt better. That will revive you. You should never have been out on a night like this. If you far to go better let me put you up. Very kind. Very kind indeed, mumbled O'Riley, recovering rapidly in the comfort of a presence he already liked and felt even drawn to.

[00:34:03] No trouble at all, returned the doctor. I've been at the front, you know. I can see what your trouble is. Shell shock. I'll be bound. The Canadian, much impressed by the others quick diagnosis, noted also his tact and kindness. He had made no reference to the absence of a hat, for instance. Quite true, he said.

[00:34:24] I'm with Dr. Henry in Harley Street, and he added a few words about his case. The whisky worked its effect. He revived more and more, feeling better every minute. The other handed him a cigarette. He began to talk about his symptoms and recovery. Confidence returned in a measure, though he still felt badly frightened. The doctor's manner and personality did much to help. For there was strength and gentleness in the face, though the features showed unusual determination soften occasionally by a sudden hint as of suffering in the bright, compelling eyes.

[00:34:59] It was the face, thought O'Riley, of a man who had seen much and probably been through hell, but of a man who was simple, good, sincere. He had not a man to trifle with beyond his gentleness, lay something very stern. The effect of character and personality woke the others to respect. In addition to his gratitude, his sympathy was stirred.

[00:35:22] You encourage me to make another guess? The man was saying, after a successful reading of the impromptu patient's state, that you have had namely a severe shock quite recently, and that it would be a relief to you. He went on the skilful suggestion in the voice, unnoticed by his companion. It would be wise as well, if you could unburden yourself to someone who would understand. He looked at O'Reilly with a kindly and very pleasant smile. Am I not right? Perhaps, he asked, in his gentle tone. Someone who would understand, replied the Canadian. Well, that's my trouble. Exactly. You hit it. It's all so incredible. The others smiled. The more incredible they suggested, the greater your need for expression. Suppression, as you may know, is dangerous in cases like this. You think you've hidden it. But it bides its time and comes up later, causing a lot of trouble. Confession. You know, he emphasized the word confession. He's good for the soul. He is dead, right? Agreed. The other. Now, if you can bring yourself to tell it to someone who will listen and believe to myself. For instance, I am a doctor familiar with such things. I shall regard all you say as a professional confidence, of course, and as we are strangers, my belief or disbelief is no particular consequence. I may tell you in advance of your story, however, that I think I can promise I shall believe all you have to say.

[00:36:55] O'Riley told his story without more to do for the suggestion of the skilled physician that found easy soil to work in. During the recital, his hosts eyes never once left his own. He moved no single muscle of his body. His interest seemed intense. A bit tall, hasn't it? Said the Canadian, when his tale was finished. And the question is, he continued, with a threat of volubility, which the other checked instantly. Strange, yes. But incredible. No, the doctor interrupted. I see no reason to disbelieve a single detail of what you've just told me. Things equally remarkable, equally incredible happen in all large towns. As I know from personal experience, I could give you instances. He paused a moment, but his companion, staring into his eyes with interest and curiosity, made no comment. Some years ago, in fact, continued the other, I knew of a very similar case. Strangely similar. Really? I should be immensely interested. So similar that it seems almost a coincidence. You. You may find it hard in your turn to credit it. He paused again while O'Reilly sat forward in his chair to listen.

[00:38:11] Yes, pursued the doctor slowly, I think everyone connected with it is now dead. There's no reason why I should not tell it. For one, confidence deserves another, you know. It happened during the Boer War as long ago as that. He added with emphasis. It is really a very commonplace story in one way, though very dreadful in another. But a man who is served at the front will understand, and I'm sure we will sympathize. I'm sure of that, offered the other readily. A colleague of mine now dead, as I mentioned, a surgeon with a big practice, married a young and charming girl. They lived happily together for several years. His wealth made her very comfortable. Then came the war. Like many others, though much over age, he volunteered. He gave up his lucrative practice and went to South Africa. His income, of course, stopped. The big house was closed. His wife found her life of enjoyment considerably curtailed. She considered a great hardship, it seems. She felt a bitter grievance against him, devoid of imagination, without any power of sacrifice. A selfish type. She was yet a beautiful and attractive woman, and young. The inevitable lover came upon the scene to console her. They plan to run away together. He was rich. Japan, they thought, would suit them only by some ill luck. The husband got wind of it and arrived in London just in the nick of time.

[00:39:50] Well, well, rid of her put in O'Riley. I think the doctor waited a moment. He sipped his glass and his eyes fixed upon his companions face somewhat sternly. Well, rid of her? Yes. He continued, only he determined to make that redounds final. He decided to kill her and her lover. You see, he loved her. O'Reilly made no comment in his own country. This method with a faithless woman was not unknown. His interest was very concentrated. But he was thinking, too, as he listened, thinking hard.

[00:40:29] He planned the time, and the place with care, resumed the other in a lower voice, as though he might possibly be overheard. They met. He knew in the big house. Now close the house where he and his young wife had passed such happy years during their prosperity. The plan failed, however, in an important detail. The woman came at the appointed hour, but without her lover, she found death waiting for her.

[00:40:55] It was a painless death. Then her lover, who was to arrive half an hour later, did not come at all. The door had been left open for him purposely. The house was dark, its rooms shut up, deserted. There was no caretaker. Even it it was a foggy night just like this.

[00:41:16] And the other asked Riley in a failing voice, his lover, a man, did come in.

[00:41:24] The doctor went on calmly. But it was not the lover. It was a stranger. A stranger? The other whispered. And the surgeon. Where was he all this time? Waiting outside to see him enter, concealed in the fog. He saw the man go in. Five minutes later he followed. Meaning to complete his vengeance is an act of justice. Whatever you like to call it with the man who come in was a stranger. He came in by chance, just as you might have done to shelter from the Fog. Or O'Riley, though, with a great effort. Rose abruptly to his feet. He had an appalling feeling that the man facing him was mad. He had a keen desire to get outside Fargo, no fog, to leave this room, to escape from the calm accents of this insistent voice. The effect of the whisky was still in his blood. He felt no lack of confidence, but words came to him with difficulty. I think I'd better be pushing off now, Doctor. He said clumsily. But I feel I must thank you very much for all your kindness and help. He turned and looked hard into the keen eyes facing him. Your friend, he asked in a whisper. The surgeon. I hope I mean, was he ever caught? No. Was the grave reply. The doctor standing up in front of him. He was never caught. O'Reilly waited a moment before he made another remark. Well, he said at length, but in a louder tone than before. I think I'm glad he went to the door without shaking hands. You have no hat, mentioned the voice behind him. If you wait a moment, I'll get you one of mine. You need not trouble to return it. And the doctor passed him going into the hall. There was a sound of tearing paper. O'Reilly left the house a moment later with a hat upon his head. But it was not till he reached the tube station half an hour afterwards that he realized it was his own.

[00:43:49] This podcast was presented by the Seattle Public Library and Foundation and made possible by your contributions to the Seattle Public Library Foundation. Thanks for listening.